Contributors

Regina Abrami is an assistant professor at the Harvard Business School. She received her Ph.D. from the University of California-Berkeley in 2002. Her work focuses on the political economy of government-business and state-labor relations in emerging markets, focusing especially on Vietnam, Cambodia, and China. She is currently completing a book manuscript on the political origins of private-sector development in Vietnam and China.

Jamie S. Davidson is an assistant professor of political science at the National University of Singapore. He is co-editor of The Revival of Tradition in Indonesian Politics: The Deployment of Adat from Colonialism to Indigenism (Routledge, 2007) and is the author of From Rebellion to Riots: Collective Violence on Indonesian Borneo (University of Wisconsin Press, 2008).

Richard F. Doner is an associate professor of political science at Emory University. His research focus is on the political economy and institutional features of economic growth in Southeast Asia. In addition to numerous articles, he is the author of Driving a Bargain: Japanese Firms and Automotive Industrialization in Southeast Asia (University of California Press, 1991); co-author, with David McKendrick and Stephan Haggard, of From Silicon Valley to Singapore: Location and Competitive Advantages in the Disk Drive Industry (Stanford University Press, 2000); and co-editor of Economic Governance and the Challenge of Flexibility in East Asia (Rowman and Littlefield, 2001).

Donald K. Emmerson is Senior Fellow and Director of the Southeast Asia Forum in the Shorenstein Asia-Pacific Research Center at Stanford University. Recent publications include "One Nation Under God? History, Faith, and Identity in Indonesia" in Religion and Religiosity in the Philippines and Indonesia (2006); "What Is Indonesia?" in Indonesia: The Great Transition (2005); "Security, Community, and Democracy in Southeast Asia: Analyzing ASEAN," Japanese Journal of Political Science (August 2005); and "What Do the Blind-Sided See? Reapproaching Regionalism in Southeast Asia," Pacific Review (March 2005). He received a Ph.D. in political science from Yale University.

Greg Felker is an assistant professor of Asian and international politics at Willamette University in Salem, Oregon. He has worked and published on the comparative and international political economy of development in Southeast Asia, focusing in particular on foreign direct investment and technology policy. He has been a researcher in Malaysia and Thailand, served as a consultant to several international organizations, and taught at universities in Hong Kong and Thailand.

Kikue Hamayotsu is an assistant professor of political science at Northern Illinois University. She was formerly a post-doctoral fellow and lecturer in modern Southeast Asian studies at the Weatherhead East Asian Institute, Columbia University. She completed a master's degree in Southeast Asian politics at the School of Oriental and African Studies (SOAS), University of London, and a Ph.D. degree at the Department of Political and Social Change, Australian National University, Canberra, in 2006. She has conducted research on state-Islam relations in both Malaysia and Indonesia and is currently completing a book manuscript tentatively titled Demobilizing Islam: Institutionalized Religion and the Politics of Cooptation. Her publications include "Islam and Nation Building in Southeast Asia: Malaysia and Indonesia in Comparative Perspective," Pacific Affairs.

Allen Hicken is an assistant professor of political science and faculty associate at the Center for Southeast Asian Studies and Center for Political Studies, University of Michigan. He studies political institutions and policy making in developing countries, with a focus on Southeast Asia. He has carried out research in Thailand, the Philippines, Singapore, and Cambodia. He is the author of a forthcoming book on parties and elections in Thailand and the Philippines titled Building Party Systems in Developing Democracies (Cambridge University Press).

Ben Kerkvliet is a professor in the Department of Political and Social Change, Research School of Pacific and Asian Studies, the Australian National University. His research emphasizes agrarian politics in Southeast Asia, particularly the Philippines and Vietnam. His recent book is The Power of Everyday Politics: How Vietnamese Peasants Transformed National Policy (Cornell University Press, 2005).

Erik Martinez Kuhonta is an assistant professor in the Department of Political Science at McGill University. He received his Ph.D. in politics from Princeton University in 2003 and has held fellowships at the Asia-Pacific Research Center at Stanford University and at the Asia Research Institute of the National University of Singapore. His research has appeared in American Asian Review, Harvard Asia Quarterly, Pacific Review, and Asian Survey.

Dan Slater is an assistant professor in the Department of Political Science at the University of Chicago. He received his Ph.D. from Emory University in 2005. His primary research project explores how divergent historical patterns of contentious politics have shaped contemporary variation in state, party, and regime institutions across seven Southeast Asian countries. His published work can be found in disciplinary journals such as the American Journal of Political Science, Comparative Politics, International Organization, and Social Analysis, as well as area-focused journals such as Indonesia, Kyoto Review of Southeast Asia, and Taiwan Journal of Democracy.

Ardeth Maung Thawnghmung is an assistant professor of political science at the University of Massachusetts, Lowell. Her book, Behind the Teak Curtain: Authoritarianism, Agricultural Policies and Political Legitimacy in Rural Burma/Myanmar (Kegan Paul, 2004), examines farmers' perception of and interaction with local and central authorities in Burma. Her main teaching and research interests are Southeast Asian politics, political economy, and ethnic conflict.

Tuong Vu is an assistant professor in the Department of Political Science, University of Oregon, Eugene. During 2007–2008 he was a Visiting Research Fellow at the Asia Research Institute, National University of Singapore. He has taught at the Naval Postgraduate School and was a Mendenhall Fellow at Smith College. His research focuses on Indonesia and Vietnam, and he has published in Studies in Comparative International Development, Theory and Society, Communist and Post-Communist Studies, and South East Asia Research.

Meredith L. Weiss is an assistant professor of political science at University at Albany, SUNY. She was formerly a research fellow at the East-West Center in Washington. She received her Ph.D. in political science from Yale University. A specialist in Southeast Asian politics, she is the author of Protest and Possibilities: Civil Society and Coalitions for Political Change in Malaysia (Stanford University Press, 2005) and co-editor (with Saliha Hassan) of Social Movements in Malaysia: From Moral Communities to NGOs (RoutledgeCurzon, 2003). Her articles have appeared in Perspectives on Politics, Democratization, New Political Science, Journal of East Asian Studies, Commonwealth and Comparative Politics, Asian Survey, Contemporary Southeast Asia, and elsewhere, in addition to chapters in numerous anthologies. Her primary foci are civil society and social movements, nationalism and ethnicity, gender, Islamist activism, and electoral politics in maritime Southeast Asia.