

Acknowledgments

MY GREATEST DEBT is to Stephanie Wood and Jim Lockhart. Without them, as will be seen from my remarks at the beginning of the introductory study, there would have been no book like the present one. To them above all goes my gratitude, along with my appreciation of a unique opportunity and my deep affection and attachment.

During my work on this project I have been at the Institute for the Study of the Americas in London, where for part of the time I have held a Leverhulme fellowship. I thank all my colleagues for the stimulating environment, and for their support and friendship. It is a wonderful community indeed! In particular I thank James Dunkerley for being such a solid guide and friend in these years, and Linda Newson for having introduced me to advanced study in the field of early Latin American history. (I have of course not forgotten my first beginnings in the field with Professor Daniele Pompejano.)

My gratitude goes also to the personnel of the Archivo Histórico del Arzobispado de México for their help and for the special space they gave me, and on behalf of Stephanie I thank their counterparts at the Archivo General de la Nación and also at the Newberry Library.

When the book was approaching its final stages, I was staying in Zacatecas, and I am most thankful to John Sullivan and the native speakers at the Instituto de Docencia e Investigación Etnológica there for their friendship as well as for sharing their knowledge and helping with doubts.

I must also thank Bob Haskett for a superb reader's report on the book, which helped greatly with its publication, and Rebecca Horn for her enlightened proofreading. And Norris Pope at Stanford deserves special mention for his kindness and his belief in the project.

I dedicate my efforts in this enterprise to my mother Giovanna, my father Giuseppe, my brother Mauro, and my grandmother Giudy, for whom no words could express my love and gratitude; and to Anna Lundebj, an angel, who would have liked so much to do a PhD. I will always remember some of her final words: "I hope that you all have a goal, a dream, an idea, something you would like to do . . . and that you do it."
