This book was first imagined more than a decade ago, in a café in Tübingen, on the way from Paris to Florence. Not, as this description might seem to imply, during a bored hour whiled away in the provinces but rather during the first of the many, many conversations that have accompanied this project from beginning to end. I am grateful to all of those whose interest and support have helped sustain me and my work through the intervening years—years not of boredom but of movement and transformation.

Thanks, first of all, to friends old and new whose love, encouragement, and solidarity have helped make it all possible: Misty Bastian, Purushottama Bilimoria, Jonathan Burt, Rajiv Chandra, Erik Duxtader, Eliza Garrison, Joshua Getz, Gabrielle Goodstein, Leslie Graham, Deana Guadagno, Volker Hagemann, Susan Katrin, Gerd Kimmerle, Ulla Konnertz, Christina Kopp-Oberstebrink, Herbert Kopp-Oberstebrink, Kim Loudermilk, Ron Malenbaum, Carla Mays, Judith Miller, Susanne Nabi, Margrit Nash, Melissa Ptacek, Rebecca Ratcliffe, Judy Rohrer, Ken Saint John, Rachel Saltz, Dirk Schumann, Sandra Simonson, Sheila Tefft, Pedro Vasquez, Katrin Volger-Schumann, Jochen Wagner. Special thanks to my parents, May and Bernard Goodstein, and to my brother Sam Goodstein for his steadfast faith in me.

I am indebted to the institutions that have generously provided material support without which the research and writing of this book would have been unthinkable: thanks to the Townsend Center and the Center for German and European Studies at the University of California at Berkeley, to King's College at Cambridge University, to Emory College and the Ford Foundation Crossing Borders/Vernacular Modernities Initiative at Emory University, and to the Alexander von Humboldt Foundation of the Federal Republic of Germany. Emory College and the Graduate School of Arts and Sciences at Emory University graciously helped offset printing costs.

Invitations from the Unofficial Knowledge Group at King's College, the Centre for Language and Cultural Theory at University of Southampton, the senaten at the University of Leipzig and the Vernacular Modernities Program at Emory provided occasions for important feedback at various phases of the project. Many thanks go to those who took “the boredom class” at Deep Springs College and the University of Rochester and to my students at Emory for asking the right questions. I am especially grateful to my colleagues in the Graduate Institute of the Liberal Arts for making it such a congenial environment for interdisciplinary work and to office manager Kendall Simpson for all his practical help.

Thanks, finally, to the colleagues who have been my teachers, readers, and mentors: to Martin Jay, who directed the dissertation that became the past life of this book, and to Wolf Lepenies, for his gracious reception of both author and critique; to Judith Butler, Marshall Duke, Charles Elder, Gerry Feldman, Tom Flynn, Gene Gendlin, Willfried Geßner, Felipe Gutierrez, Kimberley Healey, Jane Iwamura, Dieter Jähnig, Peter Jansen, Tony Kaes, Ivan Karp, Bruce Knauft, Klaus Köhnke, John Michael Krois, Cris Levenduski, Valérie Loichot, Laurent Mayali, Patrick O’Connor, Robert Paul, Jean Pedersen, Walt Reed, Eric Santner, Elaine Tennant, Jeff Walker, Janet Wolff. I owe a singular debt of gratitude to David Tracy, whose intellectual generosity and warm encouragement of my fledgling efforts as an undergraduate set me on the path that would eventually lead to Experience without Qualities; to Jay Bernstein, who understood what the boredom project was about before I could say it clearly and whose thoughtful readings have done so much to make this book what it has become; to Patrice Petro, whose incisive response to the penultimate version of the text sharpened my sense of what still needed to be said; and to Arthur Quinn, whose faith in me helped make this work possible in the first place.

From our very first conversation, I knew that with Art I had found an intellectual home. With his rich wild mind and his rhetorician’s gift for holding multiple perspectives in view at once, he listened in a way that showed me where to look. Patiently, vibrantly, Art helped me to think and rethink the story I was telling—and along the way taught me a great deal about teaching. It is a profound sorrow that he is not able to see the final product of all those hours of conversation. And so, with thanks for the wisdom, integrity, and humor that continue to help and sustain me in more ways than I can say, I dedicate this book to his memory.
