
Acknowledgments

It is a genuine pleasure to be able to thank the many individuals, institutions, and organizations that have provided me with assistance, support, and guidance during the project which has culminated with the publication of this book. A core theme of my study revolves around one institution's attempts to secure funding, so I think it is entirely appropriate that I begin by thanking the many organizations that have provided monetary assistance during the course of my study. Between 1995 and 1998 I was the fortunate recipient of the Yasuda Banking and Trust Scholarship. This scholarship allowed me to pursue studies as a Ph.D. student in the Faculty of Oriental Studies at the University of Cambridge, and without this generous award I would not have been able to undertake postgraduate work at Cambridge. After completing my dissertation in 1998, I received continued support from the Faculty of Oriental Studies as a Yasuda postdoctoral fellow in 1999 and a British Academy Post Doctoral Fellowship in 2000. It was during these years that I began to revise my thesis for publication as a book and charted my next major research project. Support from these two organizations gave me the time and resources to craft Making Waves into the book it is at present.

I would also like to take this opportunity to thank a number of other individuals and institutions in Cambridge. First and foremost, the President of Wolfson College, Gordon Johnson, deserves special recognition for all the assistance and guidance he provided throughout my five-year tenure at college. Other fellows and college members who encouraged and supported my work during my residence at Wolfson as a student and then as a fellow include John Seagrave, Timothy Mead, Conrad Guettler, Faith Johnson, and Claire O'Brien. At the Faculty of Oriental Studies in Cambridge, Richard Bowring, Peter Kornicki, Hugh Whittaker, John Swenson-Wright, Noel Pinnington, and Mark Morris proved to be first insightful advisors during my period of study and then supportive colleagues during the years of my postdoctoral research and revision. Chris Bayly, a member of the Department of History at Cambridge, also deserves special recognition for his willingness to share his time and ideas with me from 1998 onwards. As a visiting fellow at Clare Hall, Cambridge, Dick Smethurst also shared his ideas about Japanese military history and provided a number of suggestions that have improved my final manuscript in many ways. Farther afield in the United Kingdom, Ian Nish, Janet Hunter, Anthony Best, Sue Townsend, John Westee, John Chapman, and Hew Strachan were generous with their time and willing to share their ideas concerning the Japanese navy, imperialism, and World War I. Finally, friends in Cambridge who deserve special thanks include Kerstin Large, Roger and Melissa Thompson, Tony Ballentyne, Sally Henderson, Thomas Grant, David Jacques, Joe Hammond, Barry Sweetman, Joviter Katabaro, Robin Naylor, and David Luhrs.

Before attending Cambridge, I completed my M.A. thesis at the University of Hawaii. It was at Manoa that I first began my interest in the Japanese navy. I am extremely grateful for the assistance provided by David Chappell, Idus Newby, Raymond Nunn, Pat Polansky, Robert Valliant, Kakuo Shōji, Masato Matsui, Paul Varley, George Akita, Sharon Minichiello, and Sally Drake. Fellow graduate students who deserve recognition include Sumie Ota, Michiko Itō, Ken Robinson, Betsy Dorn, Craig Parsons, Jeff Dym, and David Atwill. At the University of Hawaii, I made contact with a number of Japan scholars who to this day have given considerable support to me in the United States and Japan. In 1995, I had the great fortune to meet Mark R. Peattie, who was a distinguished visiting fellow for one semester in the Department of History. Mark has been a constant source of encouragement and inspiration in all stages of my revision, and his advice has been absolutely indispensable and invaluable. No other individual apart from my supervisors deserves greater recognition than Mark does. I am also grateful to Henry Frei, Bruce Reynolds, Asada Sadao, Hiram Yōichi, Takahashi Hisashi, Ishizu Tomoyuki, and Igarashi Hirokazu.

Since July 2000, I have been a lecturer at the University of Melbourne, with a joint appointment between the Department of History and the Melbourne Institute of Asian Languages and Societies (MIALS). My final and substantive manuscript revisions took place here, and the following colleagues deserve special recognition for the assistance and encouragement they have provided: Roza Brezac, Bill Coaldrake, Antonia Finnane, Patricia Grimshaw, David Hardy, Robert Horvath, Mary Kidd, John Lack, Elizabeth Malcolm, Kate McGreggor, Peter McPhee, David Philips, Merle Ricklefs, Ron Ridley, Charles Sowerwine, Carolyn Stevens, Steven Welch, Stephen Wheatcroft, and Charles Zika. I would also like to thank Eric van Bommel for his assistance in preparing the images for this book. In Australia, but not at Melbourne, I have also benefited from comments and suggestions made by Sandra Wilson, Stewart Lone, Elise Tipton, and Ben Tipton. Since my move to Melbourne I have also been introduced to two scholars in Japan, Sakamoto Kazuto and Hashimoto Takehiko, who have been generous with their time in providing comments concerning my work.

I am deeply indebted to Michelle Hall, the Japan Librarian at the University of Melbourne, and to the members of the Inter Library Loan Staff, including Kay Gooding, Deidrie Gregory, Vija Pattison, Diana Schaffer, Bronwyn Thomas, and Vicki West. They have all been a tremendous help in locating and securing resources that have allowed me to complete my manuscript. I have also been assisted by the hard work and thoughtful comments of Hisako Fukusawa, Hideko Nakamura, and Miki Ikeda. Other individuals in Melbourne who have been a constant source of inspiration and encouragement include Janet Borland, Caroline Spencer, Chris Mullis, Teresa Castelveter, Rachel Saunders, Mike Pottenger, Zoe Saliba, Peter Breadon, Rosalind Hearder, Richard Trembath, and Bart Ziino.

Before I acknowledge my three supervisors, to whom this work is dedicated, there are a few people that deserve special recognition. First, my parents and my late grandfather Arthur supported and encouraged all my educational endeavors. I have benefited immensely from their generosity and love, and the opportunities their sacrifices have created. I would also like to especially thank Zara for the never-ending support and encouragement that she has provided since Hawaii and for making the most of every international opportunity that has presented itself. Next, credit must be given to my Japanese-language instructors, most important among them Michiko Yusa (Western Washington University) and Kakuo Shōji (University of Hawaii). Both of them inspired me to expand my understanding of the Japanese language, and moreover they convinced me early on in my studies that learning the Japanese language would be fundamental to my success as a historian. They were absolutely correct. Historians and other Japanese specialists who provided continuous encouragement in all my academic endeavors include Ulrich Mammitzsch, Edward Kaplan, Ray McInnes, Dal

Symes, Kathleen Tomlonovic, and Patrick Buckley. Last, I would like to thank the editorial team at Stanford University Press, particularly Carmen Borbon-Wu, Muriel Bell, and John Feneron. Their patience has been extraordinary, and they have provided support at every step of the way from reading my first submission to preparing the final draft.

Finally, I would like to thank Stephen S. Large, my Ph.D. supervisor at the University of Cambridge, John J. Stephan, my M.A. supervisor at the University of Hawaii, and David W. Ziegler, my undergraduate supervisor at Western Washington University. This work is dedicated to all three. Without their guidance, assistance, generosity, and friendship this work simply would not have materialized, and I would not have become the historian of Japan that I am today. Each of them instilled in me a love of scholarship and a passion for historical inquiry, critical thinking, and learning. Their generosity was unlimited, their advice was always sound, and their warmth, friendship, and passion for scholarship was always present. In short, they were ideal supervisors.
