

The ideas in this book have made many journeys, and many people helped along the way. First attempts at writing about indigenous mobilization and education in Peru took place at Brown University. At Brown, my dissertation committee — William Beeman, Blenda Femenías, Matthew Gutmann, and David Kertzer — provided invaluable encouragement and support. Their comments on early dissertation drafts gave me a solid base from which to begin rethinking and revising the manuscript that has become this book. Also at Brown, Thomas Skidmore's kind offer of office space in the Center for Latin American Studies (CLAS) gave me a wonderful place to think about, write, and complete my work. At CLAS, Ronald Rathier reminded me every day of the importance of music, food, and happiness, even in the midst of academic craziness. I owe much to him.

In the years since Brown, many colleagues have helped me develop and clarify my thinking through their comments on various drafts and sections of this book. Thanks so much to Patricia Ames, Liza Bakewell, Tony Bebbington, Paul Gelles, Penelope Harvey, Andrea Heckman, José Itzigsohn, José Antonio Mazzotti, Nancy Postero, Deborah Thomas, Donna Lee Van Cott, Patrick Wilson, and León Zamosc for your insightful questions and comments. Juan Carlos Godenzzi, Javier Lajo, Patricia Oliart, and Brígida Peraza, thank you for your sharp critiques and for engaging in critical debates. I am also indebted to Marisol de la Cadena for her helpful comments at the early stages of the manuscript, and to Julia Paley, Joanne Rappaport, Orin Starn, and Mary Weismantel for raising important questions and providing suggestions that helped this book take its current shape.

I want to extend special thanks to Blenda Femenías and Ann Wightman for helping me transform the dissertation into this book. Thank you for sharing with me your wide and deep knowledge of Andean history and ethnography, your experiences with writing, editing, and publishing, and most important, your love of Peru.

Jeffrey Lesser has been helpful and inspirational at every stage of this project. Kehaulani Kauanui, David Shorter, and Jonathan Warren have been models of exuberance, passion, and commitment. And Rima, to you I can only say thank you for sharing coffee and martinis, laughter and tears, life and love.

In Peru and Bolivia, many people were critical to the research for this book. The staff at the Instituto de Estudios Andinos Centro Bartolomé de Las Casas in Cuzco, and at the Dirección Nacional de Educación Intercultural Bilingüe in Lima were always helpful. In Bolivia, staff at the Programa de Educación Intercultural Bilingüe para Países Andinos and the Centro de Comunicación y Desarrollo Andino were also wonderful. Also in Cuzco, the staff of CADEP, CEDEP Ayllu, CESU, Fé y Alegría, KALLPA, and Puklasunchis were tremendously helpful. I am especially grateful to Patricia Ames, Martín Castillo, Andrés Chirinos, Rufino Chuquimamani, Alberto Conejo, Gonzalo Espino, Juan Carlos Godenzzi, Luis Enrique López, Patricia Oliart, Pablo Regalsky, and Inge Sichra for all their time and support, and for openly sharing their concerns, critiques, and hopes.

Most important, I am forever indebted to the many capacitadores, teachers, community leaders, parents, and students working and living in the highlands of Cuzco who opened their schools, their homes, and their lives to me. I hope that the words on the following pages can at least provide a glimpse of their struggles and in some way join in their own efforts toward social justice.

Mario, Honorata, Alexia, Gaby, y Karen, a ustedes les debo demasiado. Gracias por compartir su vida conmigo, y por ofrecermel alma y el corazón. María, Ignacio, Eloy, Virginia, y Celia, gracias por enseñarme a hablar nuevamente, y por regalarme un pedacito de su Apu Ausangate.

Many institutions provided support for this project. The Department of Anthropology and the Center for Latin American Studies at Brown University provided institutional support and research grants. I am also indebted to the Center for the Americas at Wesleyan University and to Sarah Lawrence College for supporting and funding my research. Two fellowships from the

The publication process was made less arduous thanks to the kindness of senior colleagues and friends such as David Kertzer and Jim McGuire, who shared their wisdom. I am also extremely grateful to the thoughtful reviewers of earlier drafts under consideration by Stanford University Press. The good people and fine editors at Stanford University Press, especially Patricia Katayama, Carmen Borbón-Wu, and Anna Eberhard Friedlander, made this process much less painful than I had feared. Their patience and humanity meant a great deal to this first-time author. Finally, I am grateful to my indexer, Bob Schwarz, for his keen eye.

There is nothing I can say here to adequately express my gratitude toward my family, both here in the United States and in Peru. Their unconditional love and support carried me through the cities, valleys, and glaciers of the southern Peruvian Andes and the streets of Cochabamba. Their encouragement has sustained me throughout the writing process. Gracias, abuelita, mamá, papá, Claudia y Fitito. To you, and to the memory of my grandfather, I owe the inspiration for all my work.

I would not have been able to survive graduate school, dissertation writing, life after graduate school, and writing this book were it not for my two beautiful cats, Poet and Micaela. I am extremely grateful to them for always knowing when to lie on my work, nudge me away from my desk, and simply curl up next to me, no matter how long I stayed up working. To them I owe my sanity.

Finally, this book would not exist were it not for my husband, José Antonio Lucero. His gentle but incisive critiques helped me sharpen my thoughts and my words; his tireless readings and rereadings of every single page of this book helped me clarify my arguments; and his always insightful, creative, and bold comments helped me shape this book from beginning to end. No one was more supportive, encouraging, or helpful, and there is simply no possible way that I could have sustained my teaching, my writing, my research, and my life without him. To my compañero, José Antonio, I owe everything.
