

PREFACE

This study was in part financed by research grants from the John Simon Guggenheim Foundation, the Committee on Scholarly Communication with China, and the Committee on Scientific and Scholarly Communication with the United States (Taiwan). I am deeply grateful for the compassionate concern of my host units in China: the Institute of Qing History of Chinese People's University, the Institute of Modern History of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, and Guangxi Normal University. I wish also to thank the staffs of the many collections that allowed me access to their rich historical materials, including the National Palace Museum (Taiwan), the Fu Ssu-nien Library of the Academia Sinica, the Number One Historical Archives (Beijing), the Beijing Library, the Beijing University Library, the Guilin Library, the Guilin Museum, and the Guangxi Normal University Library.

Earlier versions of some material presented here have been published in the journals Late Imperial China, Modern China, Études chinoises, and Qingshi yanjiu, and in the volumes Education and Society in Late Imperial China (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994), edited by Benjamin Elman and Alexander Woodside, and Constructing China: The Interaction of Culture and Economics (Ann Arbor: Center for Chinese Studies, 1997), edited by Kenneth G. Lieberthal, Shuen-fu Lin, and Ernest P. Young. I am grateful for the permission of the editors and publishers to reuse that material here.

Without the generous assistance of many good friends and colleagues, this work would clearly be a lesser one. The manuscript was read and critiqued, in whole or in part, by Mary Backus Rankin, Susan Mann, Wm. Theodore de Bary, Susan Naquin, Philip Kuhn, Benjamin Elman, Pamela Crossley, Paola Paderni, Kwang-Ching Liu, Ernest Young, Philip Huang, and Joseph Esherick. In the course of its preparation I received scholarly and other help from Kent Guy, Kai-wing Chow, Joshua Fogel, Anne Birdwhistell, Robert Marks, Kerrie MacPherson, Peter Bol, Donald Sutton, Timothy Brook, Michael Szonyi, R. Bin Wong, Helen Dunstan, Ning Chia, Wang Fuming, Ma Zhao, Di Wang, Weikun Cheng, Grant Alger, Pamela Crossley, Noriko Kamachi, Ellen Widmer, James Hevia, Pierre-Henri Durand, Elizabeth Cropper, Paolo Santangelo,

Marie-Claire Bergère, Gareth Stedman Jones, James Millward, Steven Shutt, Richard Belsky, and Keith Clemenger. My field research was made infinitely more fruitful and pleasurable by (in Taipei) Liang Qizi, Su Yunfeng, Zhang Pengyuan, Xiong Bingzhen, Pu Muzhou, Lin Manhong, Huang Kewu, and Liu Shiji; (in Beijing) Wang Qingcheng, Zhang Zhilian, Wang Sizhi, Qin Guojing, Gao Xiang, Yang Nianqun, Gao Wangling, Zhao Shiyu, Wu Jianyong, Peng Zeyi, and Cheng Chongde; (in Guilin) Zhang Jiafan, Hou Xiaonan, Zhou Liangren, and Guo Zhigao.

Several persons must be singled out for their special contributions to this project. First among these would be my good friend Pierre-Étienne Will, who shares with me a deep fascination with the subject of this book. No scholar could be more generous to a fellow researcher than Pierre-Étienne has been to me, sharing source materials, insights, and comradery with an admitted poacher upon his own long-established scholarly turf.

To Chen Naiguang, current head of Chen Hongmou's lineage and chief custodian of his legacy, I will be forever grateful for the opportunity to visit the Chen homestead in Hengshan and share impressions of the illustrious ancestor.

My longtime friend and editor, Muriel Bell of Stanford University Press, has been patient beyond all reason in waiting for this work and supportive of its author in any number of ways.

John Russell-Wood, erstwhile chair of the History Department of Johns Hopkins University, has always come to my aid, materially and otherwise, during the long gestation of this work. My departmental colleagues, likewise, have been unfailingly generous with their time and forthright with their criticisms as I presented portions of this work to a succession of seminars over the past ten years. Every scholar should be so blessed as to work in an environment as personally and intellectually nurturing as this department.

Finally, words cannot express the sense of gratitude and affection I hold for my wife, Jill, and my children, Josh and Sara. Without them my work would have little meaning.
