

Acknowledgments

I AM INDEBTED TO COLLEAGUES AND FRIENDS, near and far, for conversations both provocative and heartening: Nathaniel Berman, Dan Danielson, Katherine Franke, David Kennedy, Duncan Kennedy, Ummni Khan, Karen Knopp, Martha Minow, Annelise Riles, Kerry Rittich, Carol Rogerson, Bruce Ryder, David Schneiderman, and Lucie Williams have each enriched my thinking, and hopefully, my work. I am deeply grateful to former Dean Ron Daniels, who has been a source of unwavering institutional and intellectual support. I want to thank Bruce Ryder, Davina Cooper, and Robert Leckey who gave so generously of their time and knowledge in commenting on draft chapters. I also owe a special thanks to Daiva Stasiulus who first encouraged me to connect my work on the legal regulation of sexuality with the concept of citizenship and belonging. I am indebted to Laura Nemchin for almost everything I know about popular culture. And I feel very privileged for the critical engagement of Carl Stychin and Janet Halley. They each pushed me to cross many of the borders of my own imagination, and their engagement made this a better book. The borders that remain are my responsibility alone.

I was fortunate to be able to present parts of this work at various conferences and seminars, including the Subversive Legacies Conference at Texas School of Law, the Socio-Legal Regional Conference at SUNY Buffalo, the Law and Literature Series and the Faculty Seminar Series at the University of Toronto, the Dignity and Shame Symposium at Harvard Law School, the Gender and Sexuality Conference at Columbia Law School, and the Association for the Study of Law, Culture, and the Humanities Conference at Syracuse University. I am grateful for the wonderful research assistance provided by Sean Rehaag, Amy Salyzyn, and particularly BJ Wray. Thanks also to Allyn Whitmore for her assistance with the manuscript.

A special thanks to Amanda Moran, my editor at Stanford, and her colleague Jared Smith, for their patience, support, and sage advice. Thanks also to Jennifer Gordon for her meticulous copyediting.

And finally, my thanks to Laura and Leah, to whom this book is dedicated—for sustaining, enduring, and everything else.
