

I want to thank the following for their contribution to this book: Ivy Bell, Bo Songnian, Carmen Borbón-Wu, Cynthia Brokaw, Shana Brody, Samuel Cheung, Ned Davis, Joseph Esherick, Andrea S. Goldman, Susan Gosch, Robert Gough, Judith Hibbard, Hu Yimin, David Johnson, K. Jolly, Harold Kahn, David Keightley, James Kettner, D. W. Y. Kwok, Christopher Lind, Cynthia Lindlof, Mao Gengru, Harold McArthur, Peter Miller, Cyndy Ning, Brett Sheehan, Andy Sieverman, Michael Szonyi, Frederic Wakeman, Wang Ch'iu-kuei, John Williams, Wen-hsin Yeh, Zhao Chuanhua, Zhu Wanshu, Harriet Zurndorfer, and the outside reviewers.

I owe a special debt of gratitude to several people. Professors David Johnson and David Keightley were instrumental in bringing me from Beijing to Berkeley, and went out of their way to ease my culture shock in the early years of this long “Journey to the West.” David Johnson, while charting the new field of traditional Chinese popular culture, shaped my career as a sociocultural historian of late imperial China. Frederic Wakeman’s high demands on scholarship drove me back to libraries and Anhui archives again and again to search for the social dimensions of popular Mulian performance and the broader implications for Huizhou social history. Harold Kahn was a gentle and generous mentor to a Berkeley interloper and played a key role in bringing my work to publication. Last but not least, Mao Gengru, a genuine old-school Chinese scholar, provided me with a Mulian script in the early phase of my research, which helped to sustain my Huizhou focus. This book would not have been possible without the support of all of the above.

The following institutions or organizations have helped at various stages to fund this project: The China and Inner Council and Chiang Ching-kuo Foundation of the Association for Asian Studies; Department of History and Institute of East Asian Studies at the University of California at Berkeley; The National Endowment for the Humanities; Stanford University Asia National Resource Center; University Research Council, History Department, and Center for Chinese Studies at the University of Hawaii at Manoa; University of Wisconsin–Eau Claire.

They have my deepest appreciation.
