Acknowledgments

I owe my thanks to many. Thanks in the first place to Gerhard Casper, President emeritus of Stanford University, and David Holloway, former director of the Stanford Institute for International Studies, as well as to Chip Blacker and Stephen Krasner, the current Director and Deputy Director of the Institute, for their hospitality during my stay at the Institute from January to June 2003, and again from January to March 2004, and for having introduced me to Stanford's intellectual community. Thanks also to Klas Bergman, Mary Ellen Horwath, Ingrid Deiwiks, Anne Marie Kodama, and Raphaël Fleishman for their help to make Frieda's stay and mine agreeable. The chance to work in one of the world's leading centers of excellence has given me the opportunity to discover some of the many parallels that exist between the United States and the European Union and that have not attracted enough attention of researchers on both sides of the Atlantic, or at least not the attention of legal experts.

My thanks go also to Piet Eeckhout, Director of the Centre of European Law at King's College, London, who invited me to give four lectures on European constitutionalism in December 2003, and who chaired the first lecture. Thanks also to Lord Slynn of Hadley, Lord Hope of Craighead, and Lord Justice Sedley, who kindly agreed to chair the three following lecture meetings. Their comments, and those of the participants, many of them colleagues from King's College, offered me a second look at my subject.

Much appreciation goes to those who helped me turn this manuscript into readable English: to Christopher Brown of King's College, London, and to Carrie Simons of Stanford University, who not only improved the style of the text but also drew my attention to points of substance that required revision; and to Kathleen Gutman of Leuven University, who helped me with last-minute changes. Thanks as well to Eugene Mazo of Stanford University, who drew my attention to literature I needed to read, and to Alan Isenberg and André Vanier, both of Stanford University, who gave me their support. I thank all of them for their friendship. My appreciation also extends to the students in the class on European Union law that I taught at Stanford Law School in 2003 and in the Stanford International Relations Program in 2004.

My thanks for help and advice are due to many friends and colleagues, especially Deirdre Curtin of Utrecht University, Takis Tridimas of Queen Mary College, London, Antoon Herpels, René Foqué, and Jan Wouters of Leuven University, and Christophe Crombez of Leuven and Stanford University. I am also particularly grateful to the members of the work group of the Center on Democracy, Development, and the Rule of Law, Stanford Institute for International Studies, Gerhard Casper, Helen Stacy, Erik Jensen, and Allen Weiner, who allowed me to participate in their Tuesday morning breakfast meetings.

I owe a particular debt to Richard Hart of Hart Publishing Oxford and Amanda Moran of Stanford University Press, who made it possible for the book to be published in both the United Kingdom and the United States. I also thank the anonymous reviewers who pointed to several shortcomings of the first manuscript and encouraged me to improve (and, in the process, expand) the book.

I am especially indebted to Linda Mees who took care of this manuscript, as she did numerous earlier manuscripts.

The book could not have been written without the enduring patience of Frieda, who suffered the many inconveniences that partners suffer when their spouses embark on a time-consuming project.
