

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I owe my first and greatest debts to Michèle Lamont, Paul DiMaggio, Sharon Hays, Sarah Corse, and Patty Wonderley. When I decided I didn't have the guts to beg for interviews, my partner Patty flung me over that hurdle with the force of a single hilarious sentence: "Bethany, if you want to be a sociologist, you're gonna have to be more social." But that was just one of many trials that Patty saw me through. She paid the rent and put food on the table through graduate school. Her job as a UPS driver still provides most of our household income. She also tends our vegetable garden and fixes my car. She waited on me hand and "foot" after major surgery and then an automobile accident. When I face looming deadlines, Patty comes home from ten-to-twelve-hour days of hard labor and cooks dinner. When we couldn't get it all done, Patty's parents Eva Ann and Andrew Wonderley filled in the gaps. Patty gets it honest.

At the University of Virginia, I was lucky to be surrounded by a terrific group of smart and supportive friends. Most important, Sharon Hays has held my hand through the last years of this project, reading my work, providing support, and talking through problems. She would have pressed the keys for me if I'd let her. Sharon is the one person I can always count on for quick advice or a speedy read. Sarah Corse also made a big difference. I found her on the couch in my office when I joined the department in 1998, and she has since become a treasured source of friendship, guidance, and coffee. As my official mentor and associate chair of the department, she provided valuable resources and protected me from excessive obligations. The funding she secured for our collaborative project on dormitory décor paid for the laptop I am typing on today. Life just won't be the same now that she has her own office couch!

Countless other people have helped make this book possible. Without any one of them, I might not have made it. But I owe my greatest debt to Michèle Lamont, whose steadfast dedication to me and my research has remained every bit as strong as it was when I was her student at Princeton. From my early days in graduate school, Michèle pushed me to take the long road, to collect original data, to conduct in-depth interviews, and to incorporate a comparative methodology into my research. She prepared me for the pragmatic and analytical challenges I would face and helped me make the difficult transition to thinking of myself as a scholar. In the writing process, she offered lengthy and careful comments on more drafts than I want to admit. And, perhaps most important, she offered translations of my words into other sociological languages. I find much of my inspiration in her retelling of my contributions.

Michèle also co-chaired my dissertation committee with Paul DiMaggio, and the combination helped develop my passion for intellectual collaboration. They made room in their schedules for joint meetings and wrote lengthy comments on my work. Both managed to combine unconditional confidence in my abilities (far greater than my own), and both offered support in the form of funding, guidance, inspiration, collaboration, advocacy, and friendship. Each contributed more personal attention to my work than any graduate student could dare to expect from one mentor, much less two. Of course, their written work started it all. Bibliographic citations cannot do justice to the intellectual debt I owe these two scholars.

Paul has been at once an inspiration, an advocate, and a sparring partner. Some of my most rewarding moments in graduate study happened in the process of trying to change his mind. He also built institutions that were essential in my intellectual development. Two critical turning points in my research came in the form of presentations I made for the Princeton University Center for Arts and Cultural Policy Studies, a center he created with Stanley Katz during my study at Princeton. Through that center, I've had the opportunity to present this research to people whose comments made an important impact on the final product: Jennifer Hochschild, Amy Binder, Susan Herbst, Myra Marx-Ferree, and Tali Mendelberg. Paul also sponsored my successful application for funding from the National Science Foundation and offered financial support in return for collaboration on two other research projects.

Two Princeton sociology workshops offered weekly occasions for even more intellectual exchange among graduate students and faculty. Princeton's notoriously collaborative atmosphere meant that numerous other professors and graduate students provided guidance and suggestions: Robert Wuthnow, Frank Dobbin, Miguel Centeno, Stanley Katz, Viviana Zelizer, Sara Curran, and Marvin Bressler.

But the most cherished gift I took away from Princeton is the best set of grad school buddies in the world. Julian Dierkes, Kieran Healy, Courtney Bender, John Evans, Brian Steensland, Steven Tepper, Jason Kaufman, Erin Kelly, Maureen Waller, John Schmaltzbauer, Jeff Hass, Becky Petit, Hugh Louch, Eszter Hargittai, and Marion Fourcade-Gourinchas have all provided crucial support and criticism over the years. Thanks, especially, to Espn Liszt. You are my lifeline.

This book also benefits from the careful attention of five anonymous reviewers and editorial suggestions from Kate Wahl and Doug Mitchell. Financial support for field research and interview transcription was provided by a National Science Foundation Dissertation Improvement Award and the Center for Domestic and Comparative Policy Studies. Support for analysis and writing came from the Princeton University Center for Arts and Cultural Policy Studies. Funding for travel to present portions of this project at workshops and conferences came from the Russell Sage Foundation and the Princeton University Department of Sociology. The James Madison University Department of Sociology and Anthropology (my alma mater) provided office space during an institutionally homeless summer. There, I owe special thanks to cherished colleagues Sue E. Spivey, Laurie Lewis, and Mary-Lou Wylie. Where office space is concerned, however, it should be noted that I wrote most of this draft at the Artful Dodger coffee shop in Harrisonburg, Virginia. Thanks, Deborah!

Finally, I owe much gratitude to the people and institutions that remain anonymous in this study. The project depended on the support of five institutional review boards (those of Princeton University and each of the four research sites), four English departments, seventy-six English professors, and several graduate student informants. "Ivory Towers" provided me with a visiting scholar position that furnished key resources, including access to computer labs and the library. I am saddened that my promise of anonymity prevents me from properly acknowledging all these vital gifts.
