

Acknowledgments

In writing this book, I benefited greatly from the assistance and encouragement of many individuals and institutions. I would like to thank in particular the members of my dissertation committee for their unwavering support during the researching and the writing of the dissertation on which this book is based. Their commitment to excellence in teaching and research is humbling. From the genesis of this project to its completion, Peter Katzenstein has inspired and supported me every step of the way. For his guidance, wisdom, and extraordinary generosity, he has my deepest gratitude. I am also greatly indebted to Matthew Evangelista and Henry Shue, who provided a wealth of knowledge and offered invaluable assistance in the long process of weeding out the weaknesses and honing the analytical arguments of my dissertation, and subsequently of my book manuscript.

As a graduate student at Cornell University, I learned a great deal from Professors Valerie Bunce, Mary Katzenstein, Rose McDermott, J. J. Suh, Chris Way, and David Wippman. I thank them all. I would also like to express my gratitude to my colleagues in the Government Department for their friendship and their enthusiasm for this project.

Over the years, I have learned a lot from—and have been inspired by—Mike Williams. For his wise advice and constant support he has my special thanks. Amongst other scholars, Don Abenheim, Rodney Hall, Yuen Foong Khong, Andrew Hurrell, Keith Krause, Jennifer Milliken, Thomas Risse, Adam Roberts, Jeff Simon, Kathryn Sikkink, Jack Snyder, and especially R. B. J. Walker all took time from their busy schedules to discuss my work. I am indebted to them all.

In conducting my field research at the NATO headquarters, SHAPE, and in Prague and Bucharest, I benefited from the friendship and knowledge of many more individuals than I am able to mention here. Special thanks go to Mihai Carp, Viktor Dobal, Chris Donnelly, Iulian Fota, Oana Hangan, Rick Kirby, Rob McRae, Johnny Rollins, Ionel Nicu Sava,

Gordon Smith, and Mihai Razvan Ungureanu. For helping me understand Czech society and politics, I am indebted to my friends Linda Stuchartova and Josefina Wallat.

Special thanks go to the two reviewers at Stanford University Press, who provided extremely valuable comments on an earlier draft of this book. The editorial team at Stanford University Press, particularly Amanda Moran, Tim Roberts, and Ruth Steinberg have my gratitude for their enthusiasm and wonderful support.

I gratefully acknowledge the financial support provided by the Cornell University Graduate School, the Mellon Foundation, and the SSRC/MacArthur Foundation—Program on Peace and Security in a Changing World. Their generosity enabled me to conduct the field research without which this book could not have been written. I would also like to thank the Oxford Leverhulme Programme on the Changing Character of War (CCW) for its support. Most authors agree that the process of finishing a book tends to absorb incredible amounts of time and energy. In my case, the support provided by the CCW meant that I was able to devote the past few months to this book.

Last but most certainly not least, I am extremely grateful to my family for their love, constant encouragement, and intellectual stimulation. Above all, I wish to thank them for believing in me during those moments when I had little idea as to where my work was taking me.

This book could not have been written without the support provided by so many individuals and institutions. Needless to say, however, the final product is entirely my responsibility.
