
Preface

Along the way to completing this study, I have incurred debts to many individuals and institutions. Without their assistance this work would not have been possible, and I am grateful for the opportunity to thank them now.

The generosity of several foundations and granting institutions made the research possible. A year in Japan in 1992–93 was funded by the Chiang Ching-kuo Foundation through the American Council of Learned Societies. Research fellowships from the Committee for Scholarly Communication with China and Fulbright-Hays funded a year in China in 1993–94. I wish also to thank the Department of History and Center for Chinese Studies of the University of California, Los Angeles, for graduate funding over the years. Finally, the Graduate School of the University of Minnesota provided generous grants that funded two return visits to China and Japan in 1998 and 2001.

As a young and naïve graduate student doing research for the first time in Japan and China, I benefited from the generosity of many senior scholars, who gave freely of their time and guided me through the archives with kindness and patience. In Tokyo, Professor Linda Grove arranged a graduate research position at Sophia University and introduced me to the scholars working on northeast China. She graciously shared both her time and her expertise. Professor Enatsu Yoshiki of Hitotsubashi University gave most generously of his time and expertise, walking me through the stacks on more than one occasion. Professor Hamashita Takeshi, formerly of Tokyo University, introduced me to the library staff at the Tōyō bunka. He kindly made a point to seek me out for lunches and to solicit queries. The staff at both Tōyō bunka and the Asia Economic Research Institute provided patient and unending assistance in finding the Japanese materials. I wish to thank them all.

In China, Professor Kong Jingwei, formerly of Jilin University's Department of Economics, and the senior historian of China's northeast, provided unflagging advice and help. In the winter of 1994, he personally accompanied me to the provincial archives in Changchun, provided introductions to the provincial archives in Shenyang and the city archives in Jilin city, and arranged my two tours in the countryside. Professor Cao Xingsui, now of the Beijing Agricultural Museum, provided a wonderful environment for research at Nanjing Agricultural University's Center of China's Agricultural Heritage, where he was working in fall 1993. Professor Cao and his wife Jin Ping have continued to open their home to me over the years, providing a family oasis in busy Beijing and fabulous home-cooked meals. Professor Jing Junjian, formerly of the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, has been a generous host on more than one occasion. A model scholar, he has guided me through legal sources and helped in my earliest readings of the legal records. Many individuals assisted me in the countryside, and I wish to thank the villagers of Liujiatun, Jilin province, and Mengjiatun, Heilongjiang province, who put up with my absurd questions about farming. In particular, I wish to thank Mr. Jiang Shizhong of Hulan county, who took care of me during my visit to Mengjiatun. In addition to these individuals, I wish to thank the knowledgeable staffs of the Jilin Provincial Archives, the Jilin City Archives, and the Liaoning Provincial Archives for their assistance in tracking down archival materials. In Beijing, the staff at the First National Archives was extremely helpful, and I especially wish to thank the unflappable Zhu Shuyuan, who handled my requests for help with goodwill and humor.

I owe more than I can ever repay to my teachers and colleagues in the West. My graduate student colleagues were always willing to criticize and compliment, and I particularly wish to thank Clayton Dube and Yasuhiko Karasawa. David Wakefield, who passed away prematurely, was a wonderful and inspiring friend. I still miss him very much. Since I left UCLA, several colleagues have given generously of their time and read and commented on parts or all of the book manuscript. In no particular order, I wish to thank Pamela Crossley, Peter Perdue, Michael Chang, William Rowe, Furichi Daisuke, and John Shepherd. I also thank Lynda Bell and the second anonymous reader for Stanford University Press. Special thanks are due to my former classmates Matthew Sommer and Bradley Reed, whom I burdened with parts of the dissertation and all of the book. They saved me from mistakes, and their questions and suggestions made this a far better book. Of course, all errors and infelicities remain my own. Finally, I wish to thank John Feneron and Muriel Bell at Stanford University Press for putting up with my procrastinations and shepherding the book. I also wish to thank William Rowe and the journal Late Imperial China for allowing me to republish large parts of Chapter 5.

At the University of Minnesota, fellow probationary faculty provided invaluable and timely feedback. I especially thank Thomas Wolfe, J. B. Shank, David Chang, Hiromi Mizuno, Kevin Murphy, and Liping Wang. Ann Waltner and M. J. Maynes read the book in detail and provided unflagging encouragement and assistance. David Good provided help in clarifying the argument. My debt to them all is profound. Lastly, I thank my graduate student RAs, Ma Yuxin, He Qiliang, and Fang Qing, who tirelessly entered data, catalogued legal cases, and hunted down gazetteers and passages from the Qing Veritable Records.

Ultimately, a book is an intellectual endeavor, and so my greatest debts are to my teachers, past and deeper past: it is to them that I dedicate this book. Neil Kemp's sardonic style yet passionate teaching on Tudor and Stuart history instilled in me a great love for history at a very early age. Shortly afterwards, Colin Evans introduced me to the pleasure of social theory. I remember my time spent in their classrooms fondly. At the University of Michigan, where I received both my B.A. and an M.A., professors Ernest Young, Harriet Mills, Kenneth Lieberthal, and Michel Oksenberg were model teachers and scholars. Each encouraged me to pursue my interests in China and taught me the skills needed. Though a scholar of colonial America, Professor John Shy was instrumental in my decision to go to Taiwan to study Chinese in 1985 and to attend graduate school soon after. He was an unparalleled teacher, and his two courses, which book-ended my undergraduate life, convinced me to pursue history. At UCLA, professors Fred Notehelfer, Herman Ooms, Josh Muldavin, Scott Waugh, and especially Kathryn Bernhardt were inspiring teachers and mentors. Kathryn's comments and interventions in the dissertation workshop were a model in graduate student training. Finally, James Lee—who was at Cal Tech at the time—was most generous with his time as I was writing the dissertation.

My greatest intellectual debts go to my two closest mentors, Philip Huang and Robert Brenner. Bob's influence is evident enough. His theoretical insights into economic development in general, and his invaluable contribution to the debate on the transition to capitalism in particular, were major reasons for my going to UCLA. I can not hope to repay his generosity and support over the years. Philip provided an indescribably rich learning and research environment. His reading and writing seminars were models in open discussion and critical debate. I can only hope to emulate his style. His book The Peasant Economy and Social Change North China, which I first read in 1986, while living in Taiwan, got me interested in Chinese social history. I have tried to follow his attention to both trees and forests.

Lastly, I wish to thank my family. My parents, Robin Wallace and Robert Isett, provided love and support. I only now understand and appreciate what it requires to be a parent. My children, Isabella and Sebastian, are always happy to bring me back to the present. I thank them for that and for their unquestioning patience. I owe a karmic debt to Huang Wenmei who has been a constant source of encouragement and joy. In 1994, she sat in archives with me in Beijing, Shenyang, and Jilin and helped hand-copy many of the legal documents used here and also accompanied me to the countryside to do interviews. Sadly, I do not possess the poetic touch needed to express my affection and admiration for her.
