

Acknowledgments

THIS BOOK BEGAN as a research paper I presented at the Institute of Global Studies in Power, Culture, & History at Johns Hopkins University in March 1998. I owe special thanks to Bill Rowe, who has inspired and encouraged my study of this topic and given me many helpful suggestions and much support during the long gestation of this book. I would like to especially thank Joe Esherick, a reader for the Stanford University Press, who read the entire manuscript twice and offered the most comprehensive, detailed, and constructive comments, which helped me shape and sharpen some important arguments and greatly improved the book. I also want to thank the two other, anonymous, readers for their comments and suggestions. I am very grateful to Akinobu Kuroda for inviting me to and arranging a seven-month research and writing sabbatical at the Institute of Oriental Culture of the University of Tokyo in 2005, where I made crucial progress on the manuscript. Many scholars have supported this study in various ways at different stages, and I would like to thank Timothy Cheek, Kishimoto Mio, Perry Link, Tobie Meyer-Fong, Murata Yujiro, Susan Naquin, Jonathan Ocko, Sakamoto Hiroko, Kristine Stapleton, Richard Smith, Sun Jiang, Suzuki Tômô, Shuo Wang, Jeffrey McClain, Wen-hsin Yeh, Seiichiro Yoshizawa, and Madeleine Zelin. I am grateful to the history writing group of the 2006–7 fellows at the National Humanities Center, including Robert Beachy, Francesca Bordogna, Christopher Browning, Jan Goldstein, Sally Hughes, Benedict Kiernan, Sheryl Kroen, Jann Pasler, William Sewell, Sarah Shields, James Sweet, and Rachel Weil, for their comments and suggestions on my manuscript. I thank Terry Anderson, Troy Bickham, Olga Dror, Chester Dunning, April Hatfield, Carol Higham, Andrew Kirkendall, Adam Nelson, David Vaught, and Lora Wildenthal—my colleagues at Texas A&M University—for reading portions of my earlier drafts or otherwise generously providing help. I thank Walter Buenger, head of my department at Texas A&M and Ben Crouch, executive associate dean of the College of Library Arts, for their consistent support in providing research funds, releasing me from my normal teaching duties, and allowing me leave to work on this book.

During the years when the manuscript was taking shape, I was invited to give talks on the teahouses of Chengdu at several institutions: Academia Sinica (Taipei), Nankai University (Tianjin), the Hopkins-Nanjing Center (Nanjing), Hitotsubashi University (Tokyo), University of Tokyo, University of California-Irvine, Sichuan University (Chengdu), Ecole des Hautes Etudes en Sciences Sociales (Paris), and University of Texas (Austin). I thank the scholars and students who attended my presentations for their stimulating comments. I also owe thanks to Jiang Mengbi and Xiong Zhuoyun, long-time residents and teahouse-goers in Chengdu, for telling me of their own experiences in the teahouses. I thank John E. Knight for permitting me to use the photos of Chengdu taken by Luther Knight, a missionary who taught in Chengdu in 1911 and 1912, and photographer Wang Yulong for helping me get permission to use Knight's photos. I also want to thank Jean Elliott Johnson for providing and giving me permission to use the photos taken by her father, Harrison S. Elliott, in 1906 and 1907. I owe additional thanks to photographer Chen Jin, who generously permitted me to include his excellent photos in this book. My thanks also go to Sun Bin, Zhang Youlin, Li Wanchun, Liu Shifu, Xiong Xiaoxiong, Pan Peide, and Xie Kexin for granting me permission to adopt some details from their great scroll painting, Old Chengdu (Lao Chengdu). I thank Ann Kellett for her expert copyediting. I would also like to express my gratitude to senior editor Muriel Bell at Stanford University Press for her encouragement and expert direction through the entire publication process, to editorial assistants Joa Suarez and Kirsten Oster for their valuable help, to senior production editor Judith Hibbard for guiding me through the production process, and to Richard Gunde for his meticulous copyediting and insightful comments on the final manuscript.

This project received financial support from the American Council of Learned Societies/National Endowment for the Humanities; the Japan Society for the Promotion of Science; the Institute for International Research at the Hopkins-Nanjing Center; and the American Historical Association, which provided a Bernadotte E. Schmitt Grant for Research in European, African and Asian History. I was also supported by fellowships for this project from Texas A&M University, including an International Research Travel Assistance Grant, Department of History/Center for Humanities Research Fellowships, and funding from the Program to Enhance Scholarly and Creative Activities. I want to thank the National Humanities Center, which provided an excellent environment for revising this manuscript as I also worked on the second part of my teahouse project ("Public Life under Socialism: Teahouses in Revolutionary and Reformist Chengdu, 1950–2000”) there during the 2006–7 academic year. I thank the staff of the Chengdu Municipal Archives for allowing me access to their massive archival collections, which are the foundation of this project, and for providing good service when I did research there. My thanks also go to the Sterling C. Evans Library at Texas A&M University, Sichuan Provincial Archives, Sichuan Provincial Library, and Sichuan University Library. Earlier versions of Chapter 3 and Chapter 7 have been published in the journals Twentieth-Century China and European Journal of East Asian Studies, respectively. Figures 5.1, 6.5, 6.6, and 7.1 were used in my article published in the Journal of Urban History. I thank the editors and publishers for permission to reuse the materials here.

I dedicate this book to my friend and teacher Steve Averill (1945–2004). I first met him when he was conducting research at Sichuan University in 1989, and he later worked with Ernest Young to invite me to the University of Michigan and Michigan State University as a visiting scholar, supported by a Young Chinese Scholar Fellowship of the Committee on Scholarly Communication with the People’s Republic of China (sponsored by the American Council of Learned Societies), in 1991. Steve was the one who led me into Western historiography and helped me as I transitioned from being a China-trained historian to an America-trained historian during my early years in the United States. After I left Michigan, he continued to give me his generous support in all possible ways, carefully reading every paper I sent him and offering inspiring and constructive comments. He gave me many invaluable suggestions and generously shared with me the benefits of his experience and teaching materials pertaining to East Asian history. Even after he became very sick, he devoted a great deal of time to editing my paper “Masters of Tea” (which became Chapter 3 of this book) and published it in the final issue of the journal Twentieth-Century China, for which he was editor. I saw him for the last time at the 2004 annual meeting of the Association for Asian Studies in San Diego. Although very weak, he attended my panel and gave comments on my paper about the teahouse guild (an earlier draft of what became Chapter 2) and advertised my forthcoming article in the journal Twentieth-Century China. He expressed high expectations and put forth a great deal of energy on this study and his spirit has always inspired me to work very hard toward its completion.

Finally, this book would not have been possible without the support of my family. My deepest gratitude goes to my wife, Wei Li, and my son, Ye Wang, who made life much more fun and meaningful during the years when I was deeply focused on this project. My heartfelt thanks also go to my parents and my older brother, who have always been among my most enthusiastic supporters.
