

Acknowledgments

Many people have sustained me during the years of writing this book, and several communities have nurtured this project.

I thank my editor Norris Pope for his intellectual engagement, professionalism, and kindness. Thanks also to Emily-Jane Cohen and the rest of the staff at Stanford for shepherding the book through the production process.

For time to write and resources to pursue my research, I am grateful to Lehigh University. The English Department granted me a pretenure leave and provided much-needed funding, which was generously supplemented by Faculty Research Grants and a Frantz and Class of 1968 Fellowship. More precious than money has been the intellectual camaraderie of colleagues in the English Department and throughout the university. I am especially grateful to John Pettegrew for many hours of stimulating conversation about American radicalism, modernism, and Dos Passos—and for generously putting aside his own work to read the entire manuscript. Dawn Keetley gave valuable responses to several chapters, and I cannot thank her enough for her collegueship and friendship. Christian Sisack, Chris Robe, and Bob Kilker provided superb research assistance at various stages of this project, and I am fortunate to have had the help of such gifted scholars at the start of their careers. I am indebted to the many Lehigh students who participated in my undergraduate and graduate seminars on American modernism: their enthusiasm and insight brought this project to life and sharpened my thinking.

I offer deep thanks to Greg Forter and Fred Moten, who provided astute readings of the whole manuscript. Each grasped the aspirations of this project and offered crucial advice about how to realize them more fully. This is a better book because of them. Many others have read portions of the manuscript, encouraged the work, or offered professional advice. Thanks, among others, to Brent Edwards, George Lipsitz, Casey Nelson Blake, Myra Jehlen, Bill Mullen, Judith Butler, Wendy Brown, Hayden White, and Jim Clifford. It has been a great pleasure to discover in the Association for the Psychoanalysis of Culture and Society a community of scholars and clinicians who believe that a socially engaged psychoanalysis can be a practice of liberation and social justice. Thanks especially to Lynne Layton, Simon Clarke, and Mark Bracher for responding to my work and to Elizabeth Young-Bruehl for her encouragement.

Portions of this book are derived from my doctoral dissertation, and I am grateful to the members of my Berkeley dissertation committee: to Carolyn Porter for her faith in the project and the inspiration of her scholarship; to the late Larry Levine for the generous gift of his joyful conversation and for teaching me much about the practice of cultural history; to Sue Schweik for her idealism and her commitment to the power of poetry; and to the late Mike Rogin, who was also raised within the Left and showed me new ways of exploring and extending the tradition. I owe thanks to many others in the Berkeley community—more than I can name here—but I am especially grateful to my sister-in-spirit, Jody Lewen and to Danny Kim for years of friendship and intense conversation about these matters. Barbara Leckie, Franny Nudelman, Ben Reiss, Susan Courtney, David Kazanjian, and many other friends and colleagues challenged me to think more clearly about literature, politics, and psychoanalysis. I thank Hilde Clark for her insight, which helped me and this project to flourish. My union brothers and sisters in the Association of Graduate Student Employees/District 65 UAW intensified my faith in the power of solidarity and in workplace democracy—and the knowledge gained with and from them has found its way into these pages.

I owe thanks to my comrades from many countries who participated in the Oxford University Socialist Discussion Group: our explorations of democratic alternatives to capitalism have strongly influenced this book. I am particularly grateful to Robin Archer, Hanjo Glock, Adam Steinhouse, Pritam Singh, Meena Dhanda, and Yuli Tamir for inspiring conversations over many years about these matters. For sustenance over an even longer period, thanks to Neal Dolan for arguing with me about modernism and everything else, to Tom Nolan for sharing my love of Dos Passos and my hope for radical community, to David Chrisman for his investment in the creative life—and to all three for their friendship and for reading the work. Ben Nathans gave me a place to live—and he has been close friend, colleague, interlocutor, reader, and adviser.

I come at last to my family, whom I thank for unstinting love, support, and inspiration. I hope that this book is true to the spirit of my grandfather, Joseph Moglen, socialist, union activist, and working-class intellectual, who first helped me to dream of justice. My father, Sig Moglen, gave me Dos Passos's U.S.A. to read when I was fourteen—and decades of conversation with him about political aspiration and disappointment, about personal and social vulnerability, and about the power of literature have influenced this book from first to last. For his love and companionship I give thanks; his death taught me more about grief and loss than anything I have known. To my brother Eben, I am grateful for a continuous stream of intellectual stimulation, for material generosity and professional support, and for his love. My brother Damon was my first comrade and model for all others: for his loving solidarity, his friendship, his faith in me, his engagement with my work, and for the inspiration of his crusading spirit, thanks is too small a word. Sheila Namir has been a magical recent arrival: I thank her for her astute reading of my work and for the love that animated it. My mother, Helene Moglen, made the greatest contribution of all to this project. Her love has sustained me always. Her delight in literature and her gifts as teacher and scholar have inspired me—as have her passion for justice and her talent for fostering political community. She put aside her own work to read draft upon draft of mine. She taught me what the critic's craft could be and as mentor, editor, colleague, and friend, she helped me to find my own way. I dedicate this book to her—and to the memory of my father.

Kristin Handler has been my cherished companion in all things. She read drafts of every chapter; she talked through all the arguments; she believed in the work and helped me through the rapids. I give her deepest thanks for her love, for joy, for all we have shared during these years.
