

Acknowledgments

I am greatly indebted to a number of people and institutions without whose help this book could not have been written. Foremost, I want to thank the employees of the social service center in Sham Shui Po, Hong Kong, with whose help I conducted the bulk of the research for this book. These individuals generously (and literally!) made space for me in their cramped office and in their busy work lives from May 2001 through June 2002 and made every effort to accommodate any needs or requests that I had then or have had since. Likewise, I remain extremely grateful to the mainland Chinese immigrant women and children who shared aspects of their lives with me, thus enabling me to gain understanding about how they experienced their transitions from mainland Chinese to Hong Kong life. My discussions about these individuals in this book simply do not convey the extreme enjoyment that I experienced through my daily interactions and conversations with them. Furthermore, I hope that I have not in any way betrayed the trust they placed in me with the details of their everyday lives.

Rubie Watson, my dissertation supervisor at Harvard University's Department of Anthropology, has for the past twelve years consistently given her dedicated attention and interest to my research and writing projects. It is difficult for me to express the full range of gratitude that I feel for this ongoing support. I greatly value the encouragement and guidance that she has provided throughout this time, without which my work on this project would have faltered long ago. James L. "Woody" Watson and Michael Herzfeld, the other members of my faculty committee, have also contributed immensely to the successful completion of this book. Additional faculty mentors at Harvard who served as important influences in the development of my intellectual interests in the formative stages of this project include Stanley Tambiah, Sally Falk Moore, and the late Begonia Aretxaga. A number of colleagues in the department, particularly Manduhai Buyandelger, Michelle Tisdell Flikke, Vanessa Fong, Erica James, Pilar Montalvo, Sisa DeJesus, Young-a Park, and Sonja Plesset, provided unflinching comradeship and essential critical commentary on my work while I was a graduate student. I remain extremely grateful to all of these members, past and present, of Harvard's Department of Anthropology.

A number of institutions provided the financial and logistical support that enabled me to conduct the research for this book in Hong Kong. Substantial funding for the project was provided by a research grant from the National Science Foundation (BCS-0090244). The Blakemore Foundation and the United States Department of Education Foreign Language and Area Studies (FLAS) Program provided generous financial support that enabled me to spend one full year studying intermediate and advanced-level Cantonese at the Chinese University of Hong Kong's Yale-in-China Language Center from August 2000 through July 2001. I am also indebted both to Dr. Elisabeth Sinn at Hong Kong University's Centre of Asian Studies, where I was affiliated from August 2000 through July 2001, and to Professor Tan Chee Bing at the Chinese University of Hong Kong's Department of Anthropology, where I was affiliated from August 2001 through July 2002. Their personal and institutional help enabled my access to Hong Kong researchers, libraries, and academic support, without which I could not have completed this project. During the final stages of writing and editing my dissertation based on this research, I was supported by a Graduate Society Dissertation Completion Fellowship from Harvard University.

While conducting research in Hong Kong, I relied on a number of professionals and academics for information, help, and advice. In particular, I would like to thank Nelson Chow, Ernest Chui, Leo Goodstadt, Juanita Ho Kit-mui, Tim Ko, Agnes Ku, Viki Wai-ki Li, Iris Liu, Tik-sang Liu, Maria Tam, Gordon Mathews, Joseph Bosco, Cora Man, Janet Scott, Aihe Wang, and Stephen Yau for their support and encouragement of my research.

I also owe many thanks to a number of individuals in Cambridge, Massachusetts, who have contributed to my ability to complete this book. I would like to thank Anya Bernstein, Director of Studies at Harvard University's Committee on Degrees in Social Studies, for her flexible approach to faculty management that has allowed me to forge a balance between my professional life and my family life. Without her understanding and support, I could not have found time to complete this manuscript while also teaching, advising, and raising two young children. I am also grateful to have had the opportunity to engage with the excellent students and faculty members in social studies, with whom I have shared many conversations on subjects related to this book. In particular, I would like to thank Ajantha Subramanian, who first suggested that I might frame my book in terms of “migration across political difference,” and Mae Bunagan and Currun Singh, students whose senior honors theses touched on similar topics and with whom I spent many hours discussing various aspects of immigration, citizenship, and belonging in the United States and in France. I am also extremely grateful to a number of individuals who have read and provided critical commentary on drafts of this manuscript. My work has benefited substantially from close readings of the entire manuscript provided by Vanessa Fong, Sonja Plesset, Tulasi Srinivas, Rubie Watson, and Andrea Yang. I also thank Erica James, Manduhai Buyandelger, Elanah Uretsky, and Catherine Geanuracos for providing important feedback on selected chapters. Laura J. Miller and Kimberly DaCosta, as members of my writing group, have provided weekly commentary on my work for the past year. Their careful readings and thoughtful comments have been particularly important in enabling me to finish this book. Sonja Plesset and Jason Ur provided last minute advice in selecting and formatting photographs to go along with the text. Asya Troychansky helped with checking citations quoted in the text.

A number of friends and family members in both the United States and in Hong Kong also provided crucial support for my research and writing over the past ten years. In Hong Kong, I would particularly like to thank Jacqui Hutchings, Patrick Condon, Bobby Mohseni, and Bellyann Tamayo for providing friendship, places to stay, and child care. In the United States, I would like to thank my family, including Laurie Newendorp, Terry Newendorp, Kathryn Lindquist, Ken Newendorp, Taylor Newendorp, and Kate Murphy, for their unfailing encouragement over many years.

At Stanford University Press, I am extremely indebted to Muriel Bell for the consistent support and expert editorial advice that she has offered me throughout the process of revising and publishing this book. The final version of this manuscript has also benefited greatly from the extremely helpful comments provided by Sara L. Friedman and one anonymous reviewer. I would also like to thank Kirsten Oster and Joa Suarez for their patience and enthusiasm in dealing with my many questions and concerns throughout the publishing process.

Finally, I owe a special thank you to my husband David, who has provided daily encouragement for my research interests and professional life throughout my graduate school and postgraduate career. More so than anyone else, I could not have completed this book without his help. My sons, Zeke and Gabriel, who have lived with this project for their entire lives, were especially patient as I worked to complete the final version of the manuscript. Zeke has been an invaluable research assistant in all my Hong Kong-based fieldwork, and I find inspiration on a daily basis from Gabriel's optimism and zest for life. My most constant sources of support throughout this long, difficult, and rewarding project, David, Zeke, and Gabriel have all contributed in their own important ways to the final result.
